British Cultural Values

How civilised people within Britain should all aspire to act...

British Cultural Values are one of the things that made us the envy of the cultural world, and one that has left an ever lasting legacy and impact on the global population, either through the influence of the British Empire, or through direct emulation from those outside of it.

Its not a set of values based on our modern forced "multicultural" society, but a natural one that goes back many centuries, based on our national religion, which is Christianity.

Not ethnically based, although many indigenous Brits share a close (albeit) old and distant culture with our friends in Northwest Europe, due to hundreds of years of conflict, war and eventual slow natural integration over many centuries, not just the past 70 years, as others lie about.

Of course, we have always prided ourselves at our ability to learn from and welcome others into our British culture (if it was deemed socially acceptable to the majority to do so), and have in our efforts to remain the envy of the cultural world, embraced elements of many different foreign cultures that have integrated into ours over the years - with British culture all the better for it.

The values are simple, but in no particular order...

Men should be gentlemen, and behave in a civilised and controlled manner when around women and children.
Our older generations are to be respected.
Defend ones self, but do not seek to harm others.
Try and be truthful as often as possible, but without malice, or to deliberately offend.
Respect women, and value their kindness.
Respect men, and celebrate their strength.
Obey the laws, whilst standing up to tyranny and oppression.
Protect our vulnerable, and especially our children.
Honour our military, and support those who keep us safe.
Show courtesy and manners to others, without being weak.
Acceptance of other cultures and understanding, without supplanting our own.
Take care of your local, national and environmental areas, keeping things tidy.
... and so on.

Not an exhaustive list, but im sure that people can catch the drift (unless they don't want to integrate...)

As you can see, that British culture is very balanced and civilised, whilst also being (somewhat) flexible to other influences.
Not everyone, including indigenous or native Brits adhere to all of the above, but they should, and so should ALL who wish to life a safe and prosperous life in this green and pleasant land, because its a great set of values to live by.
Hopefully, in time that will change.
